

ROMAN GRAFFITI

This is an ancient graffiti, it is located in the "Alemanes street" downtown Seville. It is painted in an outside wall of the cathedral.

At first view it seems to be really old, in fact it is. So, it's origin takes place in the Roman Hispania, when the Roman Empire conquered most of the European lands.

A long time ago, many romans didn't agree with their government, but they knew if they complain furiously about something to the emperor, their end would not be gentle. Therefore, they painted these symbols in the walls of the street to do it in an anonymous way.

This graffiti is still here , in Seville, and if you walk along "constitution Avenue" you'll be able to see them!

From my point of view, it is really interesting and it is not the type of graffiti we can see in bridges. I've chosen it too because it represents that graffiti doesn't need to be a modern, colourful and painted by young boys wearing hoodies, what's more, you can use it to express that you disagree with something too.
